This short presentation implements Geospatial analysis of historical US Federal Census from 1890-1920. Drawing on interdisciplinary approaches from the social sciences and humanities, the project explores residential networks and domestic-social habitus. The presentation addresses key questions related to the immigrant household structure and the immigrant family upon migration, such as: Were immigrant families typically seperated for long periods before reunited in America? What comprised a typical immigrant household? Who hosted boarders, and how many individuals lived as boarders or lodgers? And how did boarders affect the composition and the nature oft he household? By examining these questions, the presentation offers a nuanced understanding of the lived experiences of immigrant families and explores the impact of housing arrangements on the family.
